The action taken so far in the matter has consisted in taking off a squared map of the City showing the head in feet available in each of the squares

I find that with the exception of a small portion consisting of the Fort and Central ward the head on the entire city system is sufficient to make us to use have attached thereto hydrants without the use of any fire engine at all

The ordinary rule with regard to fire mains is that they should not if possible be of less than 4" diameter a at least 3" diameter. In certain portions of the City the diameter is only 2½" - but there are portions where the available head is anything from 50' to 80' -- and the 2½" pipes may I think be considered as sufficiently efficient

With regard to the Jail and Central College there can be community supplied with there own manual pumping plant

With regard to the fort where the head is also small - this is supplied with a large main - which can be fitted with hydrants - and have working the a manual engine

The [illegible] somewhat more difficult [illegible] and the plans will have to be carefully worked out as [illegible] as for the City proper

If Jail care these projects prepared on these lines I will have other issued accordingly -- but before such a decision is arrived at I think it would be well while considering whether the project is worth taking up at all

In the City proper - owing to the construction of the houses - at the Small local fires are possible - (and then would probably be put out before external aid arrived) I very much doubt whether anything in the nature of a large fire is within the bounds of possibility I ~~should say~~ would suggest that the records of fire, for say the last 20 years should be investigated - when I think it will be found that the fire service [illegible] would be rather a white elephant

Another point which needs consideration is the fact that a fire brigade service is not of much avail any practical use unless there are efficients fire brigade, to form which picked men have to be taken, and trained to a very high state of discipline - The mere provision of fire appliances is of very little use, and I think it is worth serious consideration whether the case is one which should be taken up seriously at all
